Start by asking your child about their interests - this will allow them to have agency in the process.

Once interests have been identified, present options of how to engage with the materials - for example, if your child expresses interests in learning about Black women, then select 5 or 6 for them to choose from to focus a lesson around for the day or week.

Play to your child’s strengths - for subjects that are a must but may not be as interesting perhaps schedule those in the morning when your child is most alert.

- Affirming the dignity and agency of your child by allowing them to exercise choice
- Teaching your child the beauty of multiple ways of accessing and creating knowledge outside of dominant culture
- Demonstrating how to lead without domination
- Practicing compassion for yourself, child, and those you are co-parenting with

“We give yourself grace. Give your child grace. We’re all doing the best we can.”

- Trina Greene Brown